In today's world, the elite fear a military coup — especially in the big five nations of the world: Russia, China, the United States, India and Pakistan. They fear it because a military coup would mark the end of the status quo. “In the big five countries, it is not seen as a risk because of the regime change,” an Indian military analyst told me, “but it can destabilize them.” Stability is the name of the game in the world of globalization. It's the game that the World Bank and the IMF and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and all of the other global institutions play. And so this is what happened. Last year, an Army general, speaking before a seminar in a city outside Delhi, called for a coup to overthrow the Indian government. This government, he said, was “anti-national, anti-Hindu” — and he didn't mean that in a good way. He meant it in a way that demonstrated the same sort of fear that an elite in a country with a democracy might have of a military coup. The General called for military coup in April 2011 — just as India was beginning to push back against Islamist terror groups in the region. A week after the General's speech, India signed the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP) with 10 other countries. These 10 countries comprise a bloc that is the major destination for Indian trade. Because the General had spoken publicly, it's been widely reported. Even the Wall Street Journal published a story on it. What's far less reported is the fact that a week after the General's speech, the General resigned, was dismissed by the government and sent on a long overseas posting. India has a constitutional institution that allows for the government to dismiss a serving general and his family. After the General's speech, the chief of the Army's planning agency resigned and was sent on a long overseas posting. He has not been returned to the country. On August 6th, I gave a presentation on "The Iconography and Symbolism of My Little Pony" to the students and faculty at the University of St. Andrews.
